The chemical study of this water in its relations to animal and regetable life presents new points of interest. The most important of its chemical properties are so familiar to us that we rarely think of them, and do not sufficiently prize them. Pure water has neither Laste, nor smell, nor pungency. It is neither sour like vinegar, nor sweet like sugar, nor alkaline like soda. It irritates no acree of sensation, even the most delicate; nor is the tenderest part of the enimal frame disturbed by contact with this universal fluid. It is thus fitted to penetrate unfelt, into the subtlest tissues, and without causing the slightest jar to flow along the finest, most hair-like vessels. It soothes and assuages wherever it comes, lessening inflammation—lulling pain—diluting unhealthy fluids within the body—and washing morbid humors and waste materials from the sickly and changing frame.

Again, as a cooling agent, water is rea or the running stream. But we are 188 sensible how it watches over us, as it were, every passing moment, dispelling each rising heat, and removing from the body every excess of warmth which might disturb the equable workings of its many parts. Do we eat inflammatory food, or drink over-stimulating fluids, the excess of bodily warmth produced converts a portion of water into vapor, and the lungs throw it off into the air. Do we, by hard labor, or other unusual

KNOW THYSELF.

BY HARRIST N. BUSHNEY.

There is not a human frame upon earth that is not by an inexorable law predisposed to some hereditary disease, and the knowledge most to be sought for is, how to modify or altogether eradicate such tendencies. The ignorance of the masses with regard to the science of medicine and the phenomena of disease is truly wonderful. People of intelligence and education in all other sciences and subjects are literally in the dark regarding their own or-ganization or physical requirements.

To the family physician is left the en-tire matter as blindly and devoutly as the most unlettered boor does the immortality and future disposition of his soul to the priest. In this fluid, so clear, so bright, so grate-ful to the system, so healthful to the temperate, so necessary to all—the de-light of Grecian song—the charm of the The physician may be incompetent or the flame, and its under surface will become bedewed with moisture, and drops of water will trickle down its sides. Collect this water and submit it to a current of electricity; the liquid will disappear and in its stead the two gases, oxygen and hydrogen, will remain. These experiments prove—first, that while burning in the air, the honor of medicine, use mystery and concealment with regard to human ills and the necessary remedies, causes and antidotes; giving technical and befogging names for the simplest things, and which one tacks the courage to demand in the plainest of Saxon.

But we dare predict the dawning of a brighter day, that with the advancement of the age and the growing intelligence of all classes, will learn to know themserved consists of these two gaseous selves and not trust blindly to others.

A Cunning Baboon.

Many are the anecdotes related of the baboon. An Indian chief possessed a tame baboon, which, in common with all the monkey race, entertained a dread of snakes; its master, from mere wantonness, forcibly entwined a dead snake round the baboon's neck, when the animal sat motionless for upwards of an hour, stupefied with fear, and, on the snake being removed, stole timidly into the but of the chief. —Last winter a Boston lady sent an order to Worth for an evening dress, with instructions that it should be made trea decollete. The great man cabled back he wasn't making dresses that way at present, to which milady replied, "Make it as low as possible." The gown arrived in due time; it was trea decollete, and it was soon worn at a large entertainment, where it at once attracted the attention from the clements of weakness.
